a graphic novel might contain the same number of pages as a prose novel, it simply takes more space to tell a story in words and pictures – despite the old adage that a picture is worth a thousand words. More confusingly, a graphic novel is often not even fiction – there are many autobiographical graphic novels, as well as works of journalism,

It does make use of many dated metaphors, that to the simpleton makes it appear deep. Too short to allow for the development of plot or characters, which given that it is a play is reasonable, but that does not excuse it when people read it as a novel (which they shouldn't). Keep in mind that the play's primary audience was simple minded presents.
